The German education and training system has been the subject of considerable attention from other nations, and has often been used as a model. David Phillips' book brings together articles from some of the best known names in the field including Mitter, Glowka, Hearnden, Fuhr, Robinsohn and Prais and wagner. The book is organised into four sections. Section one examines the historical inheritance of the present education system. Section two covers standards and assessments and section three discusses vocational education and training, and area of the German education system which has received much admiration. Finally, and crucially, section four addresses questions about the future of the current system in a unified Germany.

This is the extraordinary story of the English poet Randall Swingler, godson of the Archbishop of Canterbury, communist, librettist, publisher, propagandist, poet and war-hero. It is a book about the Second World War and the story of the African and Italian campaigns, recorded uniquely through the eyes of the ordinary soldier. It is a case study of the intellectual consequences of the Cold War in Britain, McCarthyism and Zhdanovism. Croft's retelling of Randall Swingler's life from comfortable childhood and public school through to crushing penury will appeal to cultural, political and literary historians.

The Use of English

'My friends amused themselves shooting cigarettes out of each other's mouths with a slug gun' remembers a pupil of fifty years ago. A concerned HMI was told by the headteacher of a secondary modern in Tottenham School that 'my science staff can't handle girls', and a governor of a Bristol grammar averred that 'girls need music more than boys'. So much for the good old days. The accounts of people who attended school in the 1950s and 1960s reveal indiscipline, injustice and indifference. Bullying was endemic - by pupils and teachers. This book makes a convincing case that primary and secondary schools in England and Wales, have improved greatly over the past half century. Thoroughly researched and evidence-based, Adrian Elliott's findings challenge the public perceptions and pessimistic views so often proclaimed by the media. The exploration of the 'golden age' of selection and public examinations strongly challenges the persistent view that a return to selection would benefit the poorest children. Elliott examines whether schools are out of control, and whether out of school activities such as team games and orchestras are really disappearing and finds that neither is true. All this, plus international comparisons of school achievement, give the lie to the myth of declining standards in schools. Adrian Elliott writes from a perspective based on his own experience as a teacher, deputy head and headteacher of two large comprehensive schools for a total of 25 years, and later Ofsted inspector. And he draws also on his experience as a parent, an observer and even as a pupil. He gives us interviews with students, staff, heads, parents and governors. He examines underused sources of evidence such as HMI and GCE examiner reports, as well as official papers, from the post war period. He juxtaposes this with visits to schools today and concludes with a chapter on why so many schools are successful. Throughout, he argues that standards of teaching, learning and leadership in our schools have never been higher. This is a book for anyone interested in education and the school standards debate. And it is for teachers, headteachers, governors and parents, many of whom know that what they see in their schools bears no relation to the media scaremongering about schools today.
